The Topic

For a decade now, the European Court of Justice has been integrating its long-standing functional constitutionalism with a new principled layer. Solidarity is the key to this principled constitutionalism.

The lecture will first introduce the new constitutionalism. Second, it will embed it in a European republican tradition that aims at a European democratic society. Third, it will show that this new constitutionalism suggests a new understanding of social and political cleavages, not least those of redistribution: whereas these have hitherto been seen as cleavages between Member States, they are now to be reconceived as cleavages within a society. This has a number of consequences for the interpretation of EU fiscal and social law.

About the Lecture Series

The lecture series on the 'Future of the Fiscal State and the Social State in the European Union' has been set up in order to address major issues of the future framework of the European Union dealing with taxation, social security, fiscal transfers, multi-level fiscal and social governance and the concept of solidarity within Europe. This involves both the division of labour between the Member States and the European Union as well as the interaction between the different European Institutions and their inner workings.

About the Speaker

He is currently working on a book that traces a renaissance of republicanism in the current constitutional development. Together with a group of colleagues, Prof. von Bogdandy is preparing a new edition of the volume on Union constitutional law on this basis.
